Child maid* campaign has been launched in Morocco. "We hope that we will raise public awareness of the dangers of this social problem, which is depriving several thousand girls of their human rights and jeopardizing them and their future," Yasmina Baddou, the Secretary of State for the Family, Childhood and the Disabled told the reporters.

The campaign will feature a series of radio and television awareness and information spots. Discussion forums will be held in each of the four regions covered by the project: Casablanca, Rabat, Fes and Marrakesh. They will be directed to people who employ child maids. A publicity caravan will roam the target cities, handing out awareness materials to families who employ child maids and those considered likely to send their daughters to do domestic work.

It is difficult to estimate how widespread the phenomenon is in Morocco since it happens within families. Human Rights Watch says there are approximately 66.000 child maids in Morocco. A study carried out in the Grand Casablanca region puts the number of child maids in the city at 25.000. Current employment laws stipulate that children cannot be employed until they are 15. Besides, the employment of minors is regarded as illegal.

Prevention is therefore one of the main elements of the "Inqad" programme, which is intended to deal with the causes of the phenomenon. It will also encourage families in rural areas to send their daughters to school. Sociologist Mohammed Bouchtaoui says there are many social and economic reasons for the phenomenon." First of all, there's poverty and significant school drop-out in rural areas. Culture also plays a part: a lot of families still practise gender discrimination. Girls traditionally feel that they have to take care of the domestic chores.

Rkia Badie, 10, has been working in a house in Temara for six months. Although she says she is happy with the way her employers treat her, she says that she misses her family: "I would have liked to carry on studying at home with my family, but I have to help my parents."
