Document A

[The scene takes place in 1900 in the USA.]

On the first of March, I went to my mother and asked for a loan.

‘Marriage,’ she said, her eyes hard with disapproval. The etched lines around her lips deepened. ‘Do as I had to.’

5 I heard the accusation in her voice. I was an only child and my father had doted¹ on me. He was proud of my career. Prior to my return to Dayton, I was a pianist with an all-woman ensemble in Philadelphia and on occasion, he sent generous gifts of money to supplement my income. When he died from a weak heart four years ago, my inheritance, small as it was, angered my mother. She considered that money to be hers, not mine. Two years later, her money dwindling², she remarried.

10 Now, as she wrote a bank check to cover one month's expenses, she said, ‘You're twenty-nine, soon to be thirty. You should have married years ago. You should have children by now. You should have a husband to look after you.’ She held out the check, and all at once, her voice softened. ‘Catherine, please. Find someone to marry. For your sake. Do it quickly.’

15 I wrote to the other two women in my ensemble telling them that I missed them and the music. If you need a pianist, I can be there within the week. They had been furious when I left a year ago. Now, they did not respond.

20 My thoughts in turmoil, I was unable to sleep, and my complexion turned sallow. I searched through my storage trunks and sorted old correspondence. I wrote letters to former suitors and to friends who lived in the East. Such good times we had, I penned in letter after letter. It would be lovely to see you again. Every day, I waited for the mail. I am married, former suitors wrote. A visit would be nice, friends wrote. But the children keep me so busy these days.

25 I considered the elderly sagging widowers and the whiskery rotund bachelors who lived at the hotel. Marriage to any one of them would be the final humiliation and the very idea of it repulsed me.

I wrote to Edward.

Dear Sue¹,

No, I haven't joined the Ballets Russes. To be honest, I'm not so sure what to do next. I suppose there was something very neat and reassuring about having my future planned out by my father. I've been looking in the newspaper at the jobs available, wondering what it is I might want to do. I'm not even sure which direction to take. My mother thinks it is very undignified for me to be looking to the newspaper for career options and has been discreetly asking at her bridge parties to see if anything "respectable" comes up.

No, I don't think it is very usual for women to go to college. There were female students at the University of Illinois but not many of them, especially not in biology. Even though they were attending college, they seemed to limit themselves to feminine courses of study, like modern languages, literature, home economics. Not a geologist among them, I'm afraid!

Dear boy,

Why is it that things such as languages and literatures are 'feminine' courses of study? No censure to you, David. I know you were repeating a universal truth – albeit² a questionable one. We are in an age where women work in professions previously prohibited. Although there still aren't many, women have proven themselves competent as doctors, scientists, businesswomen. Now that the doors are open, why aren't more women rushing in to gain entrance? Instead, they are settling down, saying, 'Who wants to win the Nobel Prize like Marie Curie? It will be much more satisfying to learn how to dress a roast chicken.' Of course, everyone is welcome to their interests, and perhaps there are women who truly desire to learn nothing more than chicken-dressing or home economics. But why is a woman who has studied chemistry or geology less fit as a helpmeet than a woman who has studied literature? I'm not a suffragette, but when it comes to the topic of women and education, I do get irate.
