Students find passion, friendship among hundreds of clubs, activities

Finding a place to meet friends and be creative is one key to happiness at Arizona State University, and among the more than 1,000 clubs and organizations are several dozen related to playing an instrument or singing. Among those are five different groups who sing a cappella.

5 Adriana Whitmore has been singing since age 9 and was in the Chicago Children’s Choir and Voice of Chicago. She knew she wanted to continue singing when she got to ASU but wasn’t sure how, until she saw the all-female Pitchforks group perform at the ASU Welcome for incoming freshmen<sup>1</sup> last week.

10 “I saw them and fell in love and I had to try out,” said Whitmore, who admitted to being a little nervous about the audition.

Hundreds of students attended the a cappella auditions held at the Music Building over several days this past week.

15 Research has found that students who make connections and are involved in university life are more likely to stay in school and graduate, according to Kendra Hunter, senior associate dean<sup>2</sup> of students.

“It’s critical for students to be involved and to get that sense of belonging by contributing to a community and feeling that sense of pride,” she said.

Hunter said that freshmen are still discovering their interests and can be involved in several different activities.

20 “Whatever it is that students are interested in, if there’s not a club or organization that’s in existence, they can create their own,” Hunter said.

It was not a dorm known for its great parties, to say the least, but there was a tradition in Godwin Honors Hall of throwing one big blowout the Friday night after midterms<sup>1</sup>.

5 Craig had, himself, only one exam (Political Science) and a paper due (Great Books). The Poli-Sci exam seemed like no big deal. He'd just make it a priority to go over the outline at the back of the book the morning before the test.

Apparently, his fellow students had harder schedules, or approached their studies differently. Beginning the weekend before midterms, Godwin had become a ghost hall, and Perry barely darkened the doorway of their room except to sleep for a few hours in the early morning before he was gone again.

10 ("Where you been, man?" Craig asked him in passing, to which Perry replied, "The library. Studying," as if it were a given.)

15 Even the cafeteria was silent. Instead of the usual clusters, people sat separately, absentmindedly lifting forkfuls of eggs or baked beans to their mouths while staring intently into the textbooks open beside their plates. Craig watched as one kid accidentally speared the page of his book instead of the meatloaf on his plate, and then even brought the fork halfway to his mouth before realizing there was nothing on it.

20 No wonder his father had had to call on his old buddy Dean Fleming to get Craig into this place. These were not his people. They were an entirely different species. Back in Fredonia there'd been professional students, for sure, but theirs had been such a casual superiority that Craig never bothered to pay any attention to how they were doing it. They just waltzed out of their Advanced Placement courses<sup>2</sup> fluttering the A-pluses on their exams, sauntered down the hallway to the meetings of the clubs they were presidents of, or grabbed their violins and headed off to the orchestra room.

25 That these Godwin Honors College kids worked so hard both frightened and puzzled Craig, and made it even more impossible for him to imagine, somehow, joining them at the library. So far the only thing he'd done at the library was check out an armload of CDs, which he'd downloaded to his laptop.

"Are we going to meet this week?" Craig asked as Perry stumbled past him on his way to the shower in the middle of midterm week.

30 "Huh?"

"Study group?"

"We've been meeting," Perry said.

"When?" Craig asked.

"At the library," Perry said. "Constantly."

35 "Why didn't anybody tell me?" Craig asked.

"I don't know," Perry said. "I guess we figured if you wanted to study you'd be at the library."
