Document A

Jabu has always been her father's child. She wasn't kept at home while a brother, males always first in line for education, went to school. Her father found a place for her at a mission school, paid the fees and a younger brother waited his turn for entry.

5 Elias Sipiwe Gumede was not a tribal chief yet he was the man of authority in recognition that he had managed to get himself educated to a high standard with letters after his name, BEd., due to his own proud determination dismissive of the difficulties for a rural black boy; but sisters' and cousins' husbands did not take the example of favouring girls, although nobody would contradict him with disagreement over the way he ignored the correct procedure of the people. At first her mother
10 endured, with silence like consent, the disapproval of the women to be read in their faces when they chanced to look up from private gossip; then the daughter brought home excellent reports, the mother proudly walked in on the enclaves to announce, 76 per cent in arithmetic, 98 in isiZulu, 80 per cent in English, each term further success. The girl child's learning achievement. Well, English, that was something,
15 but isiZulu – that's our language of course she knows – from home, from the time she learnt to speak. Her father was not aware either of the gossip or the counter boasts, or if he knew was not concerned; he expected to have her homework presented to him every night and equally could not be expected to fail to see where her attention had strayed or she had scamped what should have been pursued. She soon did not
20 resent this strict condition because of the way in which he presented it, it was as if it was some special occupation, special game only she, among the children, shared with him. And as she grew up she realised how much she had gained in the process of real comprehension, from her father, beyond the instruction by rote, of school.

25 Was it his intention or her idea that she go away over the border to Swaziland to a teacher's training college?

The one over the border was not restricted by colour. This was not the advantage mentioned when the possibility of her entry was discussed, it was the quality of degree offered which, her father insisted to his wife, was decisive, the standard of the teachers – and he knew who they were, people who had studied in Africa and 30 overseas, universities in Kenya and Nigeria as well as in England.

The mother did not want a child of hers to disappear, out of sight in another country, even if neighbouring. – So young, young still, this year seventeen, our child should stay with us a few years and then when she's more ready – She broke into English from their own language.

Nadine Gordimer, No Time Like The Present, 2012

Document B

Daniel Hughes had always wanted to take a master's degree but the cost of the qualification in the UK put him off. The current average price of a UK Masters degree is £6,000 a year, with some universities charging more than double that figure.

5 "I was thinking of going to study abroad after graduating from Bangor University<sup>1</sup> and working in the NHS<sup>2</sup>," he says. "I could speak a bit of Swedish and the master's courses in Sweden are free, so it made sense to look there."

Now 29, Hughes is in his second and final year of an MA<sup>3</sup> in media and communications studies at Stockholm University. [...]

10 He is one of a growing number of UK students opting to study abroad in Europe at universities that offer master's degrees in English for a much lower fee – or no fee at all.

15 According to a report from the Institute of International Education, the number of European master's courses taught in English has mushroomed to over 6,600, up 42% in the past two years, with the Netherlands, Germany and Sweden leading the way.

Like Sweden, German public universities charge no tuition fee, although the small number of private universities offering professional master's degrees do. [...]

20 "For German universities it's not about financial gain – it's about internationalism. German students benefit from having a more international campus and in terms of employability it's a big plus for young people to take a master's abroad," says Andreas Hoeschen, head of the London office of the German Academic Exchange Service.
